Meeting the challenges of Agriculture and Forestry with Commissioner Bob Odom

The Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry is implementing a new program that takes effect immediately to reduce populations of the sweet potato weevil in southern parishes.

Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom said the program's focus is to eliminate the weevil by starting with the sweet potato seed being planted in a producer's field.

"Under the current Sweet Potato Weevil Quarantine Program, our inspectors are working in the packing shed. To really get the weevil numbers down, we feel the program needs to start in the field and continue all the way through the packing process," Odom said.

Because southern parishes are not weevil-free, most sweet potato production in the state has moved to northeast Louisiana where parishes have been designated "weevil free." These parishes can ship sweet potatoes anywhere in the United States.

"Our goal is to go farm by farm, and eliminate the sweet potato weevil so that these producers can increase their profitability through higher marketable yields and possibly enter markets that were closed to them before," Odom noted.

Unlike cotton's infamous boll weevil whose lifecycle takes place entirely on the cotton plant, the sweet potato weevil has more than one host plant – the sweet potato and the morning glory. With an additional host plant, complete eradication is likely to be harder to come by than it has been in the state's highly successful Boll Weevil Eradication Program.

"This program is going to be an all out war against the sweet potato weevil," Odom said. "We are dealing with a bug that's not going to go away easily. We must fight it every step of the way."

The state's fight against the weevil will include several key components that are new to the sweet potato industry in Louisiana.

Craig Roussel, director of horticulture and quarantine programs for LDAF, said one of the first steps to eliminating the weevil begins with the sweet potato seed. The program allows only seed that has been properly treated or obtained from weevil-free growers to be planted.

Another component is Global Positioning System, or GPS, mapping. According to Roussel, seedbeds, production fields and storage houses will be mapped to provide acreage information for each grower and to search for correlations between sweet potato weevil populations and geographic locations.

"Once we have mapped those areas, we will place pheromone traps on the seed beds and production fields. Growers will all be notified of trap captures, keeping them aware of what's going on in their fields," Roussel added. "Many times the grower doesn't know about the problem until it's too late, and they've lost their whole field to the weevil."

Other procedures required by the program include spray applications based on a schedule developed by the LSU AgCenter, record keeping, disposal of culled potatoes by a recommended prescription, and regular unannounced platform inspections for packers.

"All of these components are mandatory for every sweet potato grower and packer in a weevil-infested area," Odom pointed out. "We will not be successful in our attempts to eliminate the sweet potato weevil if there is not total compliance with the program."

McPherson Honored with Award

The Louisiana Pest Control Association recently selected Department of Agriculture and Forestry agriculture and environmental sciences program coordinator John McPherson to receive the Paul K. Adams Award of Excellence.

McPherson has worked in and around the pest control industry for 46 years.

"My motto since I graduated from LSU always has been to upgrade the industry, and I have enjoyed working in the business and also helping my fellow competitors," McPherson said after winning the award.

The Paul K. Adams award was named for the former LPCA director and recognizes people who go above and beyond to better the pest control industry.

"John McPherson is truly a legend in the pest control industry in Louisiana," Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom said. "We are fortunate to have someone with his vast knowledge and extensive background in pest control working here at the department for Louisiana's

John McPherson, Administrative Program Coordinator, Agricultural and Environmental Sciences residents."

McPherson got his start in the pest control industry after graduating with a master's degree in entomology from LSU in 1955. He worked for two pest control companies in New Orleans before opening his own business, Southern Exterminating in Metairie, in 1957. Over the years McPherson's company grew from one employee, himself, to 15 employees when he sold the business in 1987.

While a student at LSU, McPherson became actively involved in LPCA.

"The association had been floundering and Paul Adams was the main guy that really kept the association going," McPherson recalled. "He is the finest guy I have ever known. When I had growing pains later in my own business, I went to him."

McPherson joined the Department of Agriculture and Forestry's agriculture and environmental sciences office in 1992. His work at LDAF includes coordinating the Integrated Pest Management program for Louisiana's public, private and parochial schools. He also manages environmental programs related to endangered species, food safety and fish kills.

Boll Weevil Vote to be Counted This Week

With the conclusion of the five-year Boll Weevil Eradication Program along the Red River in northwest and central Louisiana, cotton farmers in the 17-parish area have been voting since March 21 on whether they want to support a five-year maintenance program, said Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom.

"By all accounts, the program has been a tremendous success," Odom said. "Eradicating the boll weevil has led to dramatically reduced production costs. The insecticide bill over the years to fight the boll weevil was a huge expense that this program has cut by about 70 percent. Acreage in the northwest for 2001 over 2000 is expected to increase 25 to 30 percent."

"The maintenance program is to implement trapping and monitoring to ensure the boll weevil does not return to the Red River area. Personnel will be used to place and monitor traps around cotton fields. If isolated weevils are found, insecticide applications will be made," Odom said.

The maintenance program can cost farmers up to $10 per acre. Estimates are that the average will be about $7 per acre per year. During the initial five-year program the average cost was $30 per acre per year for the eradication effort.

Ballots to farmers were mailed March 21. Return ballots had to be postmarked by April 4. The votes will be counted and publicized April 11. The maintenance program will begin in 2002.

The balloting does not affect the boll weevil eradication work going on in northeast Louisiana, where the program is in the third year of its first five-year effort.

"With the success of the program we expect acreage to increase in the Red River area," Odom said. Projections are that acreage this year will be about 130,000 acres, up 40,000 acres from recent years.

Ports Asked to be on Lookout for Products from Foot and Mouth Quarantine Areas

In an effort to protect Louisiana's livestock industry from foot and mouth disease, Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom is urging all port officials in Louisiana to keep a sharp lookout for new and used agricultural equipment being imported from the European Union and the South American countries of Argentina and Uruguay.

A letter from Odom was sent recently to all Louisiana airports and maritime ports.

"We are asking for cooperation from Louisiana's port officials to keep foot and mouth disease from entering our state and destroying our livestock industry," Odom said. "I want to open the lines of communication between our department and the ports so we don't have a situation occur here similar to what happened in Alabama."

A shipment of used tractors and other farm machinery was recently quarantined at the Port of Mobile in Alabama. The 29 cargo containers were from England, where more than 250,000 animals have been slaughtered to prevent further spread of this extremely contagious virus.
